Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: ... grass, and there a perpendicular scarp of warm red earth. The trees in that region are few. Here and there a clump of pines protects a lonely farmhouse from the prevailing winds; but there was no suggestion of bareness that Sabbath noon, for the hillsides wore their robes of praise, a wealth of autumn-tinted bracken,--not dry and lifeless yet, but glowing with every shade of colour from richest bronze to palest primrose. In that translucent air the chord of colour was gorgeous, for, at a distance, as it seemed, of only a few hundred yards, the landscape softened into a wonderful blue that was neither light nor shadow. Not a human being was in sight; the silence was so great that the air seemed full of sound,--the hum of insects, the twitter of birds, the slow movements of the sheep as they rose heavily to crop the grass, or let themselves lazily down to rest again. Morning service was over, and Grizel Dalgleish, clad in a fresh white frock, was making her way home. She was very like her brother, but her face was fairer and less striking than his. His expression was more eager, hers more thoughtful; he stood ready, as it were, for the attack: she, at most, for the defence. She had that broad smooth forehead which is so restful to look upon, but to-day it was clouded, and showed a suggestion of the perpendicular line that already characterised her brothers face. I wish Dugald was here, she said. She turned in at the wooden gate of a cottage garden, and went smiling to the porch. So glad to see you out, Mother dear, she said. I am sure the air must do you good. She rubbed her fresh young cheek caressingly against the beautiful worn face. Did you miss the old girl? Mrs. Dalgleish smiled. ...
