

CheckPoint Afghanistan: TRUTH or LIES

Afghanistan, sometime in the first decade of the 21st century His ears rang. He lay dazed, enveloped in a cloud of dirt and dust, buried beneath a layer of rubble. His head spun as if he had been mercilessly tossed around for hours, and he knew he couldnt stand up, because his legs wouldnt hold him. He groaned and began to tentatively feel about his body for wounds. When his hands came back he expected them to be covered in blood. But if they were, he couldnt tell. He blacked out, and when he came to again he could make out faint images of people standing around him, talking to one another. He breathes, a heavily accented voice said. Hes lucky, said another. Everyone else is dead. Dead? Is that what had happened? Was he still alive? And if so, where was he? He felt hands on him then, lifting him, carrying him away. Ive been captured, he thought. What will they do to me when they find out who I am, and what Im doing here? In this land, with these people, it was a question he couldnt answer. But he knew if he wasnt dead yet, he would be soon.
